

How to assess job stability framework

This is your go to framework on assessing job stability.

Before a project

1. Clients history (track record of long-term projects and has consistently providing work)
2. Clients feedback (they've given and received)
3. Projects scope (primary indicator of what we can expect from a client)
 - Long term -> huge plus
 - Short term -> focus on clients history and if they have tendency to hire for similar projects that you can complete

During the project

1. Communication (client's communication style and their vision for the project's future)
2. Development (we are looking for client that can articulate a clear roadmap for the project, it suggests a long-term commitment, offering more stability for you)
 - Client's involvement in a project is minimal -> redirecting more of your resources towards projects that show higher potential

Even during shorter projects if client is eager to learn more, develop more and is excited about the results that is great indication of a good client and further job stability despite being short duration project
